A Catalogue of Folklore Holdings at the Saskatchewan Archives Board

Michael TAFT

The frustrations in the study of folklore are many and among their numbers may be counted the frustration of lack of accessibility. In earlier times, for example, parts of Canada were thought to be devoid of folklore because folklorists had not adequately explored them: inaccessible land meant inaccessible (or perhaps non-existent) folklore. Certainly this perception has led to folklorists denying the folkloristic value of parts of Ontario and the Prairie Provinces.

The more immediate problem however, involving inaccessibility, has nothing to do with perceptions of the land and its people. Even when the intrepid folklorist has gone where no one dared venture before, his or her collection has tended to remain inaccessible to other folklorists. What percentage of collected folklore finds its way into print or onto a recording? Most folklore collections remain in archives, large and small, scattered across the country.

These archives are certainly important, but their value lies, once again, in their accessibility. An immovable archive is less accessible than a printed folklore collection; an unpublished folklore collection within an archive is still rather inaccessible if the archive itself lacks the proper indexing and retrieval systems. The results of this lack of accessibility are thousands of folklore collections languishing in boxes, on shelves, in files or stacked in closets; the information in these collections hardly more available to the folklore researcher than are the people from whom the material was collected.

For ten years, 1978-1987, I experienced this particular frustration. I had taught folklore at the University of Saskatchewan and the University of Regina, and one of the results of my teaching was a mass of student folklore collections; in addition, I had been doing my own fieldwork and had thus added my own collection to those of my students. This amassed folklore data was certainly not accessible to others; it was hardly accessible to me and my students because I lacked the facilities to keep the collections in a retrievable form. All I could manage was to accession dutifully the collections and store them away in a filing cabinet. Saskatchewan was virtually a blank page as far as Canadian folklore was concerned, and yet this ever-growing collection of Saskatchewan folklore remained inaccessible.

The incentive for making the collection more usable was my departure from Saskatchewan. One of my last tasks before trekking east was to make a quick computer index of the collection and to give the collection to the Saskatoon Branch of the Saskatchewan Archives Board. (I should like to thank D'Arcy Hande for facilitating the transfer of the collection to the SAB.)

This folklore collection comprises 983 separate folklore reports—most of them student collections—and includes 443 audiotapes and uncounted collections of photographs, documents, and artifacts. With the exception of a handful of reports, the collection addresses itself to Saskatchewan folklore and is the largest single folklore collection for that part of the country. The SAB does have within its holdings other folklore collections: the papers of Eleanor Long's students from 1975, a folklore questionnaire from the 1950s, various independent folklore and oral history collections submitted to the SAB over the years, as well as individual collections which I have contributed separately to the SAB. None of these collections, however, is of the same substantial nature as the one which is the subject of the present catalogue.

The one major exception to the prairie content of this collection is my report on the folklore of the Eastern Townships of Quebec—79-02; the report and accompanying twenty-four tapes are duplicates of the original collection housed at Université Laval. The other non-prairie items deal with the folklore of students and their informants who are not native to the Prairie Provinces—a very small number of the total.

What is immediately evident in the collection is that, as stated above, most of the reports are student papers and projects. This fact has made the overall collection uneven in its general survey of Saskatchewan folklore, since my primary aim in giving students collecting projects was education and not the filling in of folklore gaps. To this end, perhaps half of the reports are in actuality "exercises" in fieldwork observation and collection.

I have had all of my students collect clever use of language in their surroundings—making note of proverbs, metaphors and all sorts of figurative speech as heard in natural conversational contexts. Along with the phrase itself, the students noted as much contextual information as they could gather about the actual performance of the phrase which they heard and witnessed. Thus, the collection is top-heavy with reports of clever use of language.

Likewise, I had all my students describe in considerable detail the interior decoration of a home. Most students used their own home (or those of their parents) for this project, and the average such report details the artifacts found in a home, their spatial arrangement, as well as the use of space by members of the household. Most of these reports include photographs.

The first few years I taught, I also had my students describe growing up in their home communities, collect examples of games and play, and describe behaviour in public places. The bulk of these assigned projects has also "unbalanced" the general nature of the collection. Such unbalancing is, of course, not bad in itself; nowhere this side of Newfoundland is there such a massive collection of folk speech, nor is there any archive that can boast such a large collection of home interior descriptions.

The remainder of the reports run the gamut of folklore (and a few non-folklore) subjects. One assignment I gave to almost all my students entailed interviewing a fellow class member on some aspect of his or her folklore. The result has been a wide ranging collection of prairie folklore topics, although these assignments do show some bias towards ritual—family celebrations tended to be an "easy" topic for most of the students, and since this assignment usually fell around Christmas time, there is an abundance of reports on family Christmas celebrations. Again, there is nothing bad about this situation; Saskatchewan is rich in ritual celebrations and the more reports on them the better.

All students had, as their final projects, an open collecting assignment, and about a fifth of this collection is made up of such reports. These final papers do indeed span the field of folklore in their contents, and while some may show all of the flaws of naive student collecting projects, there are some truly substantial and excellent reports among this group. Anyone who has taught folklore finds that a certain percentage (never high enough) of students outdo themselves—some of their results are publishable works of scholarship.

I will give no further description of the contents of this collection except to note that there is hardly any item in the material which does not yield good primary resource information on some area of folklore. Even the worst students are capable of collecting data, and while the analysis of this data might make one writhe, the data itself is nevertheless valuable. What follows is a catalogue of the reports in this collection, accompanied by two somewhat rough indexes, a place-name index and a subject index.

I catalogued this collection according to the general rules suggested by Neil V. Rosenberg in his "Outline for a Canadian Folklore Archives Cataloguing Practices Network" (FSAC Bulletin, 8, 3-4, 1984, pp. 24-27), although I have not included all facets of this system in this published version of the catalogue. What the reader will see in the accompanying catalogue is

1. accession number for the individual item. These numbers are similar to the ones assigned to items at the Memorial University of Newfoundland Folklore and Language Archive (MUNFLA): the year of accession followed by a file number. Thus, 79-12 indicates the twelfth file accessioned in 1979. Unlike MUNFLA numbers, however, I have added letters to the hyphenated numbers to indicate the individual reports in the file. Most students did between four and six assignments, so that their overall file might include up to six separate accession numbers. For example, 79-12 is a file made up of six reports, 79-12a to 79-12f.
2. title of the report. Most titles were given by the students who wrote the reports; I have supplied titles for those reports left untitled by students.
3. year. The year of accession is not always the same as the year in which the collection was made; the year in parentheses after the title is the actual year in which the project was completed.
4. format. Each collection consists of one or more different formats for data. Format information appears in brackets and includes "ms" for manuscript or typescript reports, "trans" for transcriptions of tapes, "index" for indexes of tapes, and "art" for accompanying material artifacts (quilt pieces, woodworked items, straw-weaving, decorated eggs, etc.). There may also be one or more numbers within the brackets; these represent audiotape field recordings, mostly cassettes, and consist of the letter "F"—for "field recording"—and a shelf-list number. For example, 80-16e includes two tapes, F63 and F64.
5. RESTRICTED. Some reports are restricted, and thus marked. Their contents cannot be used without permission of the SAB and the person who has submitted the report.

Following the catalogue is a place-name index, which is fairly self-explanatory. The places represented are those in which the fieldwork for the reports was done, or those with which the content of the report is concerned. Because this is only a rough index, only one place-name per report appears in this index.

The last section is a subject index, or perhaps more accurately, a genre index. For each report, I have used a three-part genre description; these descriptors are the same as those used in indexing the Journal of American Folklore and correspond closely to the classification system found in the Folklore Section of the MLA International Bibliography. I initially classified each report under one of six headings—general studies, folk literature, ethnomusicology, belief systems, behaviour, and material culture. Where a report warranted more specific classification, I have used secondary headings (narrative, music, ritual, art, etc.), and again where warranted, I have made use of tertiary headings under these secondary headings (legend, fiddle music, rite of passage, interior decoration, etc.). I have not classified the reports any further, nor have I given any report more than one tri-part classification.

The computerized catalogue upon which the present catalogue is based is housed at the SAB. There is also a copy of the complete computerized catalogue at MUNFLA. The computerized catalogue makes use of IBM PC compatible hardware and dBase III software.
