Résumé de l'article

Le but de cet article est de présenter — à titre de contribution à un champ d'activités culturelles et de recherche trop souvent négligé — une liste préliminaire d'œuvres musicales dramatiques composées pour la scène entre 1867 et 2007. Au-delà du simple exercice de recensement d'un répertoire, cet article considère ces œuvres comme d'importants documents historiques articulant les valeurs contemporaines culturelles, sociales et politiques depuis les 140 dernières années. Suite à l'évaluation des enjeux apparus en déterminant le genre et la citoyenneté musicale des œuvres, leur ampleur, la nature et l'histoire de celles-ci constituent une solide base permettant la recherche systématique au sein de cet important artefact culturel canadien.

Afin de faciliter l'accès à ce corpus substantiel, la liste préliminaire est proposée en trois formats : 1) en ordre alphabétique de noms de compositeurs; 2) en ordre alphabétique des titres de compositions; 3) en ordre chronologique d'achèvement de l'œuvre. Dans les trois listes, les compositions comportent un identifiant (« PIN » pour Preliminary Ingraham Number) composé du nom du compositeur et de la date d'achèvement de l'œuvre.

SOMETHING TO SING ABOUT: A PRELIMINARY LIST OF CANADIAN STAGED DRAMATIC MUSIC SINCE 1867

Mary I. Ingraham

National literatures are not passive reflections of naturally occurring phenomena, but integral components in the process of national development, consciously constructed pieces of the national culture, and creators of the world in which we live.
The canon is chosen, not born.

Sarah Corse

It is the consumer, not the producer, who benefits by culture, the consumer who becomes humanized and liberally educated. There is no reason why a great poet should be a wise and good man, or even a tolerable human being, but there is every reason why his reader should be improved in his humanity as a result of reading him.

INTRODUCTION TO THE LIST

The primary aim of this article is to present a three-fold preliminary list of Canadian staged dramatic music composed between 1867 and 2007 as a contribution to a previously under-cultivated field of Canadian cultural activity and research. A lexical problem arises immediately, however, a problem posed by the following question: what constitutes staged dramatic music in an historically evolving Canadian context? This introduction addresses the question by taking opera as the sine qua non of staged dramatic music, but also by treating it as one component of a broadly encompassing genre entitled staged dramatic music. The genre of opera will serve here from time to time as the measure, the point of reference for this study. The term staged dramatic music, however, will be used with greater frequency so as to indicate the full compass of the genre under question here—compass being the aim of this study.

Assumptions about the aesthetic value of Canadian staged dramatic music, as well as the impact of changes in public and private support for cultural initiatives since Canada's Constitution Act in 1867 (especially those relating to creation, production and audience development) may be at least partially to blame for the lack of such a list to date. At the very least, lack of performance and promotion opportunities beyond their premieres has undoubtedly restricted our knowledge of this otherwise rich cultural field. The works listed evidence an evolution in the narrative, form, and function of Canadian staged dramatic music over the past 140 years. Many of these works (both individually and in groups) are important historical documents, articulating contemporaneous cultural, social, and political values. For the purpose of studying the continuum of creativity in these works, and to facilitate access to what is a substantial body of information, this preliminary list is offered in three formats: alphabetically by composer's surname (List 1), alphabetically by the title of the work (List 2), and chronologically by date of completion of the work (List 3). List 1 also indicates the librettist; List 3 includes genre descriptions. Compositions are identified across all formats by a Preliminary Ingraham Number (PIN) comprised of the composer's surname and the date of completion of the work.

Just what constitutes a "Canadian" composer is problematic too, but for the purpose of this study nationality is based on citizenship: a composer who by birth or immigration is Canadian is considered to be a Canadian composer. Further to this, the citizenship of the composer at the time of the creation of the work cited is also a factor in its inclusion. To understand the complexity of this issue, consider that several works in the operatic genre by well known Canadian composers do not appear here, as they were written before the composer immigrated to Canada, such as early works by Theo Goldberg and Bengt Hambreaus. Underlying the issue of nationality are two further assumptions: defining a single musical identity for these works is neither desirable nor possible, and any perceived "Canadian-ness" in any one of these compositions is to be understood as constructed through a complex web of social, political, and cultural influences, this web being initiated and mediated by the individuals and organizations that create, fund, produce, and critique these works.

Music, drama, and staging are the simple foundations of the genre, but it has been described by numerous terms and takes on a wealth of performance forms. Indeed, the term "opera" has been used in Canadian composition to describe forms of staged dramatic and musical works from pantomimes and burlesques to ballads and all manner of musical plays. In selecting works for this list, the primary focus has been on staged repertoire that demonstrates a sustained dramatic and musical continuity¹, this decision being underscored by a broad definition of the genre of opera. Works identified to date number 379, and represent at least 184 different composers active in Canada between 1867 and 2007.

Staged dramatic music as a democratic art has existed throughout Canada's history, and a performance in the early post-colonial years was as likely to be a "burlesque in grand opera style" (e.g., Broughall's 1886 Tearful and Tragical Tale of the Tricky Troubadour) as it was to be a grand opera in the European tradition (e.g., Telgmann's 1889 Leo, The Royal Cadet). In summarizing the operatic scenes of two major Canadian centres (Montreal and Toronto) between 1783 and 1980, Dorith Cooper describes the nature of Canadian performance traditions in the genre to include:

[...] opera as “afterpiece” to a play; opera in truncated versions to accommodate the evening’s fare normally comprising a play, farce, vaudeville or concert; opera as “mainpiece” to a play, pantomime or ballet; ‘costumed’ concerts; unstaged opera in isolation with piano accompaniment and with or without costumes and scenic effects; fully staged performances of grand and/or light operas with modest and later complete production accessories. (Cooper 1984, x)

Given this varied representation of the genre, it is expected that additional works may come to light in future that should or could be included in a list of Canadian staged dramatic music.² In fact, genre ambiguity continues to be a significant challenge to compilation of a list of works to the present day, and at present this study and the accompanying list of compositions includes works that might be considered by some as not in an operatic vein, including works presented by organisations or production companies and labeled as “opera” that might be defined more clearly as parodies or compilations, and operas that incorporate folk or popular musical styles.

The twentieth-century musical presents an additional challenge to this study, as this genre also does not sit within clearly-delineated formal boundaries. As Borroff (1984) has noted in her study of American musical theatre, “some musicals are plays and some are not,” signifying that those that are considered “plays” (i.e., those that incorporate a sustained dramatic plot) generally include a musical score written by a single composer and “a set of musical numbers conceived as one score with a balanced aesthetic whole.” Such works might appropriately be included in this list as examples of original staged dramatic music. Other musicals are conceived without such continuity and are experienced as a series of unrelated “acts” in which the music is “secondary”. “In general,” Borroff continues, “the musicals that are plays can be described as musically organic, those that are not, as additive” (101). Bernard Williams, contributing to the definition of “Opera” in Grove Music Online, suggests further that connections between opera and other forms of staged dramatic music are both “complex” and “arbitrary”, concluding that the issue of distinguishing opera from other forms is more “cultural” than “stylistic”. “The present position,” he writes, “is that opera is to some extent an evaluative term, used to refer to sung drama which is either ‘serious’ enough, or traditional enough in form and technique, to be staged in an opera house.”³ Considerations of “sustained” dramatic and musical plots, the

it is the musical that has played the role in popular taste which, earlier, was played in Vienna by operetta and in Italy by Italian opera itself. To deny that the musical is opera is not simply a stipulation. It originated in part from English 19th century burlesque, and in part from operetta, in particular from the emigration of German composers to the USA, but it has developed in such a way that, at least as things now stand, the styles of dramatic performance and singing “seriousness” of intent, use of “traditional” forms and “production” (i.e. validation) by opera companies described by both authors suggests a more inclusive definition of the operatic genre than is generally considered. Preliminary examination indicates that several Canadian works labeled by their creators as ‘musicals’ might therefore be included in this list of staged dramatic music in future. These works are variously designated as music or musical comedy, farce, play, or theatre. It is understood, however, that closer consideration of the materials of many of these compositions and of the circumstances of their creation and production is required in order to establish their appropriateness for inclusion in this list.

Borroff identifies an approximate chronology for American musical theatre in general that might serve as the basis for historic genre studies of original Canadian staged dramatic music. Her chronology takes into account cross-fertilization of melodrama and pantomime, operetta (of all descriptions), minstrel shows, vaudeville and variety programs, farce, burlesques, and revues. In like manner, Keillor observes, for example, that the Canadian burlesque Broughall 1886 (Tearful and Tragical Tale of the Tricky Troubadour), which is further defined as “in grand opera style”, is actually “an adaptation of Verdi’s Il Trovatore” (Keillor 2006, 139). Dixon compiled Our Boys’ in the Riel Rebellion (Dixon 1886) from existing music for a specific community setting, and incorporated a textual narrative intended to comment on local social and political situations. Bengough 1883 (Bunthorne Abroad), a parody of Gilbert and Sullivan, and Broughall 1885 (90th On Active Service), based on then contemporary events involving Louis Riel, are further described as “musical and dramatic burlesques” (ibid.). Three of these—Broughall 1885, Broughall 1886, and Dixon 1886—are the only works contained in this list to be designated as “compiled” from existing music or music by other composers. To the extent that these works present a sustained dramatic plot in a staged setting they are of interest here, although further study of the music may be needed to determine the ultimate importance of the music in the drama.

Minstrel, vaudeville and variety shows, farces, and revues of the early years of Canadian composition—none of these are included in the list at this time, since they typically do not involve the sustained plot line or musical connectivity characteristic of staged dramatic musical works. Quesnel/Ridout 1963 makes an interesting study in this context and in the evolution and acceptance of opera as a genre. The work listed here is a reconstruction by Godfrey Ridout of Joseph Quesnel’s 1778 Colas et Colinette, originally designated as a “Comédie en 3 Actes en prose, mêlée d’Ariettes”. Quesnel’s work did not have an overture and included vaudeville in its epilogue-like conclusion. Written originally as an afterpiece to a play (cf. Cooper, above), Ridout’s restoration involved the reconstruction of orchestral parts and the composition of an overture (fourteen vocal numbers were extant at the time of the reconstruction⁴), in essence both creating and recreating a coherent musical entity in an operatic style.

The majority of works in the preliminary list do in fact have “opera” or “operetta” in their genre description.⁵ Hybrid genre labeling is more prevalent since the middle of the century, due possibly to a shift in focus from the stylistic tradition to a focus on other factors such as the function of the work, its text, its musical or dramatic style, or its intended audience. Original compositions in genres such as pantomime, masque, and pageant, however, appear only occasionally in Canadian repertoire since 1867. Examples of these sub-genres occur nonetheless throughout the period under study: Clappé 1879 (Canada’s Welcome), Pannell 1977b, (Circe) and Rolfe 2004b (Orpheus and Eurydice) are masques; Willan 1929a (Indian Christmas [Nativity] Play), Willan 1943 (Brébeuf), Harris 1952 (Portrait of a City), Anhalt 1986 (Winthrop), and Pannell 1990 (The Animals of Limbo) are classified as pageants. Rickard 1993 (Fletcher’s Challenge) carries a hybrid genre designation as an “opera pageant”. The English pantomime has three exemplars in the list: Burritt 1969 (Once Again ... Pop!), Burritt 1971 (Electric Chair), and Badian 1997 (Scenic Mosaics).⁶

Important sources utilized in the initial stages of this project include Dorith Cooper’s 1984 doctoral dissertation on opera in Montreal and Toronto, a printed library catalogue of Canadian opera produced by the Canadian Music Centre (CMC) in 1999, and George Proctor’s Canadian Music of the Twentieth Century published in 1980. Cooper provides the most comprehensive information, but along with Proctor it requires updating to include subsequent compositions. The CMC catalogue, also somewhat out of date, contains only their library holdings of unpublished scores composed by their own Associate Composers. Additional sources now widely available in digital formats have also been accessed in order to construct a more complete picture of repertoire across the period. These include materials available in print and online from public institutions such as Library and Archives Canada, further resources from the CMC, print and online publications such as the Encyclopedia of Music in Canada (EMC), Keillor’s 2006 Music in Canada, and countless journal and digitized resources such as those prepared by the CBC and the Canada Council.⁷ Composer’s names, work titles, and dates among these sources generally agree, but genre descriptions are not always consistent. Cooper’s attention to detail has resulted in the most

⁴ Keillor (2006, 90) describes Quesnel’s original work as based on “stock eighteenth-century elements” of character and plot, but which is accompanied by “skillfully written music” that “fills out” the characters.

precise listings, while Proctor lists those he includes mostly under a general genre description of “opera”. CMC contains discrepancies between print and online entries and the EMC entries under one heading include works described differently in other parts of the reference. List 3 of this article indicates genre designations found (when there is a reference to genre) in each of five primary sources used to compile the list (Cooper 1984, CMC 1999, CMC online, EMC online, Proctor 1980). The genre of other works has been identified from direct composer sources.

Finally, it must be noted that in the list several works appear with two titles, some with distinct alternate titles and others with a combination of French and English translation that is not always literal. For consistency, double titles follow the format of Grove Music Online, which shows a primary title first and indicates double or split titles within square brackets; where two titles apply, both are cross-referenced in List 2. Titles containing exact translations into either French or English utilize a semicolon to separate them, unless the title itself contains the word ‘ou’ or ‘or’. Works in a series such as those in Schafer’s Patria appear in the list as numbered Patria titles followed by a colon and the descriptive title; these works are also cross-referenced in List 2.

INTRODUCTION TO CANADIAN STAGED DRAMATIC MUSIC

The story of original staged dramatic music written and performed on what is now Canadian soil begins long before this nation was born. Its ties to the style and circumstances of repertoire from across the Atlantic are strong in the early years in particular, but long before Canada’s Confederation in 1867 modifications were required to make such works suitable for local performers, theatres and audiences. Historiographic work on Canadian music undertaken over the past fifty years has contributed a great deal to our understanding of the living and working conditions of Canadian musicians since colonization (e.g., Kallmann 1960, Proctor 1980, and Keillor 2006). And while the challenges of performing opera in a young colony such as Canada persisted well into the twentieth century, the opportunities for tailoring new works to the sensibilities and interests of audiences in this “new” world were understood almost immediately. The stories of life in Canada proved to be fertile ground for new works in a variety of dramatic genres.⁸

Musical scores for a number of these early staged dramatic musical works are no longer available and many are presumed lost. The challenge of availability and access to primary source material on original Canadian compositions, therefore, has resulted in an approach to Canadian staged dramatic music as a socio-historical phenomenon, an approach that serves ethnomusicologists somewhat better than it does musicologists. Although Canadian music defies canonization in the traditional musicological sense, it is not because the works themselves are not extraordinary (many of them are), but rather, as I have found in my own research in the areas of cultural politics and creation, because conditions of production and consumption have separated them from the mainstream. Corse's statement, cited as epigraph to this article, that "the canon is chosen, not born" rings particularly true for the situation of Canadian staged dramatic music (Corse 1997, 9), and the time has come to consider these works on their own terms.

The unique social and political domains affecting Canadian cultural production in general demand consideration of staged dramatic music from the perspectives of both reflective and cultural sociologies that view cultural objects as representative of their environment and that advocate for an informed exploration and analysis of multiple external influences. Research in Canadian culture by scholars outside of the discipline of musicology has much to offer our understanding of composers in Canada and their dramatic works. Important work has been done by Hutcheon (1995, 1990, and others), Mackey (1999), Corse (1997), and Straw (2005) in particular, in areas of multiculturalism, nationalism and identity, and their research suggests that we ought to examine the role of society and politics in the construction of cultural objects such as dramatic musical works. Additionally, cultural sociologists such as Said (1993) and Bourdieu (1993) endorse reflection on the conditions of production and consumption of culture in relation to power structures and the tensions of conflicting interests of multiple communities.

Bourdieu's critical systems of "fields of cultural production" (1993) are particularly appropriate to this study because they are relevant to a wide spectrum of cultural practices (including operatic composition) and may be applied to many aspects of creation and production previously not considered in the creative equation. These include considerations of location (the physical proximity of "players" in the field vis-à-vis each other and in relation to sources of decision-making or "power"), cultural connections (between and among "players"), and elements of taste and governance (in multiple communities—audience, producers, media, funders, etc.) that are generally eschewed by composers as extraneous to the creative process.⁹ Bridging social and cultural theories with cultural practices in this way allows us to consider multiple spheres of influence on staged dramatic music composed in Canada and to advance critical understanding and appreciation of these works in a direction more appropriate to the genre and country of origin.

Developments in the twentieth century have shifted the location of some forms of staged dramatic music, opera in particular, away from the high-culture domains of its largely Western European models towards a middle ground of high- and low-cultures. This may be the result of a combination of factors such as the cross-pollination of musical styles, variations in performance and production forces, changes in audience and musical tastes, and the continuously evolving creative impulses of composers themselves. Nonetheless, the shift is seen to have been gradual (and one might say ongoing) across the period under study. The results of this shift can be classified into three types: works that maintain their “elite” or high-culture status (including grand opera, ballad opera, and much comic opera), works intended as popular repertoires (including music for vaudeville, burlesques, parodies, and musicals), and those created primarily as “educational” works for building audiences (such as radio and television operas, and the more recent trend to short works such as “pocket” operas). Although the compositions included in this preliminary list appear as examples on a continuum of development, each work is unique in regard to some aspect of the production forces required, optimum performance venue, audience demographic targeted, potential or realized sources for funding support, and the nature and mode of critical reception pre- and post-production.

With very few exceptions, Canadian staged dramatic music is not well known even within the sphere of high-culture enthusiasts. Few works have received more than a single performance, and most are accessible only to audiences within a limited geographical area (the area served by the production company responsible for the premiere).¹⁰ Large-scale works are expensive to produce, to be sure; but ignorance of an entire body of original work has consequences beyond mere economics and impacts the entire cultural field both at home and abroad. The first step in rectifying this situation is to build an awareness of the repertoire of Canadian staged dramatic music, the aim of this article.

PRELIMINARY RESULTS: PRESENTATION OF FINDINGS

The process of compiling this preliminary catalogue of staged dramatic music works has involved a number of challenges, from locating primary source materials to finding definitive descriptions of their contents and details of their creation. Discrepancies in information are surprisingly common in the reference material, with genre definition being the most inconsistent, as noted above. In creating each work’s unique PIN, the most problematic element has been finding agreement on a date of completion for the composition. Where completion date cannot be clearly established, the date of the premiere or earliest known performance is used. Where more than one work by a given composer is assumed to have been completed in a single year, these works are listed alphabetically by title, and the designation ‘a,’ ‘b,’ or ‘c’ (etc.) is added after the date in the PIN. Compositions for which neither completion nor premiere dates have been found are identified with the abbreviation ‘n.d.’ followed by a distinguishing noun from the title of the work, e.g. “Charpentier n.d. Ballade” refers to Charpentier’s Ballade du fils de l’homme. Very few works in the list are as yet undated. Several entries indicate works completed on a conceptual basis, but these will not be considered truly “complete” for the purposes of cataloguing until they are performed (e.g., Schafer’s Patria 7: Asterion).

The total number of staged dramatic musical works composed in each decade since Confederation (see fig. 1) illustrates large-scale changes in Canadian staged dramatic music composition and, when considered within the context of extraordinary economic and political events and important federal cultural initiatives such as the centennial celebrations of 1967, suggests parallels between political cultural policy and events in the social sphere. For example, government funding for culture leading up to centennial celebrations in 1967 was followed by a significant rise in support for production companies, audience-building initiatives and opera creation that carried on into the next decade. Similar new funding initiatives for production (e.g., the Canada Council Opera Creation Fund established in 2001) in the early years of this century (albeit following years of decreasing government support) has resulted in a second “wave” of creation that may not yet have reached its peak. Fluctuations in statistics in the early years of staged dramatic music composition may not yet be significant or reliable due to the lack of available resource materials relating to original composition (i.e., more works may yet be “discovered”). Figure 1, then, attempts to document the rise and fall of staged dramatic music composition across decades. Principally, from this figure it can be noted that the vast majority of Canadian works in this genre (77%) have appeared since 1945; 64% of the total having been completed since 1967. Perhaps surprisingly, it is also evident that through periods of war, economic recession and fiscal restraint since Confederation, staged dramatic music creation may have declined, but it never disappeared entirely.

Figure 1. Chart of Original Canadian staged dramatic musical compositions written between 1867 and 2007, showing the total number of works completed in each decade.

An understanding of genre development within specific periods is not evident from Figure 1 alone. Research in these areas will undoubtedly illuminate both small- and large-scale changes to the genre that parallel external events, including changes to the scope and duration of works (the proportionate number of full length staged dramatic musical works to shorter, one-hour or one-act compositions, for example), changes resulting from technological pressures (compositions inspired by new media opportunities such as radio and television), and changes resulting from political and economic influences on creation (funding, production, and audience, for example). Broad strokes of change are, however, obvious from the list itself, in the represented narratives in full-scale staged dramatic music compositions, from the early, traditional military opera Leo, the Royal Cadet (Telgmann 1889), through the multi-media, multi-cultural Louis Riel (Somers 1967) in mid-century, to the Asian-Western fusion of musics, instruments and languages in the millennium opera Iron Road (Chan 2000). Still other works demonstrate the scope of staged dramatic music: in terms of duration, for example, the ten-minute chamber opera An English Lesson (Charpentier 1968) lies on one end of a continuum, the dusk-to-dawn rituals performed in Patria 6: RA (Schafer 1983) on the other. The category encompasses structural considerations (Hannan 2002, 120 Songs for the Marquis de Sade), aspects of musical expression (Jackson 2003, Québécoisité), performing forces (Evangelista 1990, Alice and Friends), and performance venue (Pelletier 1987, Studio variazioni sulla), all of which continue to challenge generic determination.

Historical periodization of these works is difficult. Pre- and post-Confederation periods make for obvious large-scale chronological breaks, but shorter periodic divisions are less obvious. One might expect to use the establishment of the Canada Council in 1957 as another creative turning point. But as this public institution was not established explicitly to fund the creation of new work,¹¹ it is less appealing as a temporal frame for the discussion. More important defining moments in Canadian staged dramatic music might be the start and close of WWI and WWII, and activities leading up to the nation's centennial celebrations in 1967 (which saw increased funding to staged dramatic music production through the National Centennial Commission, Canadian Music Centre, and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation). The problem of periodization in the years following 1967 is to identify which of the political, fiscal, or cultural events had more influence on the creation of original Canadian work. The details of creation and production undoubtedly hold the secret to understanding how and why certain works appeared on the Canadian scene when they did.

FUTURE RESEARCH

Research that addresses some of the issues raised in the compilation of this preliminary list is at a nascent stage. Opportunities are wide-ranging for research in areas such as the impact that federal cultural policies, public institutional

¹¹ In the section entitled "Part Five: General Observations", Articles 98 (a) and (g) of the Canada Council's First Annual Report the following are stated:

"98 (a) (a) As a general rule the foundation should not initiate projects of its own, and it should not directly commission works or engage artists, but there may be exceptions"

"98 (g) The content of programmes or the choice of plays should not be dictated. Even the performance of Canadian works should not be an express condition of a grant, although the extent to which an organization has presented Canadian artists and works may be considered when an application for a grant or renewal is made." (Canada Council 1958, 25–26).

practices, and the changing priorities of contemporary society had on the creation of staged dramatic music. The long term impact of genre, location, and the composer's contacts needs study, as does the extent to which the process of creating contemporary staged dramatic music is considered more important than its completion (bearing in mind current practices of workshopping operas at several stages of their development to allow for performer, producer, and audience input).

The findings of research to date indicate a rich field of influences and a variety of cultural objects that are important to an understanding of Canadian historical identity. As social and political priorities have evolved since Confederation, so too have the forms and functions of staged dramatic musical creations, particularly in the choices of texts, styles of musical expression, types of performance and production, and the structural dimensions of the genre itself. Other factors suggest themselves for research, such as who and what gets funded, the subject matter and textual basis of the libretti, types of genres and styles of music as supported by funders, producers, and audience, and the relationship of the many production and reception stages as they affect the creation of the work.

From creation to production and consumption, music is subject to a variety of social and political constraints. In the evolving climate of Canadian cultural production since Confederation, composers have created staged dramatic musical works that reflect Canadian society, that reflect for example the changes in its governance, fiscal, and cultural policies, and the realities of multiculturalism. Works in this genre reflect Canada through the stories of their texts, through structural and technical developments to the genre itself as it adapted to the requirements of particularly Canadian radio and television media (and by adaptation to their fiscal constraints), and through the increased awareness and acceptance of multicultural influences, both textual and musical. Further study into the circumstances of staged dramatic music creation, when combined with analysis of the impact and responses of governments, public institutions, producers, and audiences on these works and on the genre itself, will show that Canadian staged dramatic music both exemplifies the social and political goals of the nation in specific time periods and reflects contemporary practices in musical style and genre. The lists that follow, then, are more than a preliminary exercise in establishing a repertoire. Collectively they constitute a first step in determining a genre by its scope, its nature, and its history, and thereby they lay a foundation for systematic research into this most important Canadian cultural artifact.

ABSTRACT

The primary aim of this article is to introduce and present a preliminary list of Canadian staged dramatic music composed between 1867 and 2007 as a contribution to a previously under-cultivated field of Canadian cultural activity and research. More than simply an exercise in establishing a repertoire, this article approaches these works as important historical documents that articulate contemporaneous cultural, social, and political values over the past 140 years. Through a discussion of issues raised in determining genre and musical citizenship, the scope, nature, and history of these works lays a foundation for systematic research into this most important Canadian cultural artifact.

To facilitate access to what is a substantial body of information, this preliminary list is offered in three formats: 1) alphabetically by composer's surname; 2) alphabetically by the title of the work; and 3) chronologically by date of completion of the work. Compositions are identified across all formats by a Preliminary Ingraham Number (PIN) comprised of the composer's surname and the date of completion of the work.

RÉSUMÉ

Le but de cet article est de présenter — à titre de contribution à un champ d'activités culturelles et de recherche trop souvent négligé — une liste préliminaire d'œuvres musicales dramatiques composées pour la scène entre 1867 et 2007. Au-delà du simple exercice de recensement d'un répertoire, cet article considère ces œuvres comme d'importants documents historiques articulant les valeurs contemporaines culturelles, sociales et politiques depuis les 140 dernières années. Suite à l'évaluation des enjeux apparus en déterminant le genre et la citoyenneté musicale des œuvres, leur ampleur, la nature et l'histoire de celles-ci constituent une solide base permettant la recherche systématique au sein de cet important artefact culturel canadien.

Afin de faciliter l'accès à ce corpus substantiel, la liste préliminaire est proposée en trois formats : 1) en ordre alphabétique de noms de compositeurs; 2) en ordre alphabétique des titres de compositions; 3) en ordre chronologique d'achèvement de l'œuvre. Dans les trois listes, les compositions comportent un identifiant (« PIN » pour Preliminary Ingraham Number) composé du nom du compositeur et de la date d'achèvement de l'œuvre.
