

Grandmother Toe

Kimberly Ann Carfore

Volume 32, numéro 2, 2016

Radical Ecologies in the Anthropocene

URI : <https://id.erudit.org/iderudit/1042997ar>

DOI : <https://doi.org/10.7202/1042997ar>

Aller au sommaire du numéro

Éditeur(s)

Athabasca University Press

ISSN

1705-9429 (numérique)

Découvrir la revue

Citer ce document

Carfore, K. (2016). Grandmother Toe. The Trumpeter, 32(2), 204–205.
<https://doi.org/10.7202/1042997ar>

Résumé de l'article

For decades scholars of the humanities have been going back and forth between nature/culture and civilized/wild dichotomies trying to answer questions about nature and the wild. Do we, as a humanity, need to go back to the wild? Does wilderness exist or is it a social construct? Is the concept of wilderness essentialist? Do we need to conserve the wild? After years of vacillation, discourse becomes stuck in the confines of language and logic. Poetry, art, and other forms of creative expression free concepts from their structural limits. This piece of poetry titled "Grandmother Toe" offers a creative exploration of the concepts of wilderness, ancestry, evolution, expressing a possible way forward through an uncertain future.

Grandmother Toe

Kimberly Ann Carfore

Where do I turn
in the wilderness of the mind?
Who do I ask
when my ancestors provide a disconnected path to my past?
Will mountains, sky,
Earth, or Internet
provide me with answers?

As water drips down
the crevices of my back,
the top of my feet,
down my heels
touching the ground,
clouded skies watch.

My thoughts wander,
through stochastic channels
and windy paths.
Massaging my feet
coaxes out the voice of Grandmother Toe.

She speaks:

I have been here—

*the sharp, dry claws of the iguana and the soft, fleshy toes of the gibbon,
I have trodden many paths,
and led the way
through many wild places
of the mind and in the land.
I know the way.*

*Tied in the twisted muscles
of the body,
are cells
from 20,000 years ago.
They know how to exist.
They know the way.*

Hidden in the canopy of the world and the illusion of the self.