CONTRIBUTORS/COLLABORATEURS

JANET GUILDFORD is a senior research associate with the Beach Meadows Research Associates of Halifax, Nova Scotia. She is the editor, with Suzanne Morton, of Separate Spheres: Women's Worlds in the 19th Century Maritimes. DAN BUNBURY is currently working in the Student Services Department at Dalhousie University, where he recently completed his PhD in Canadian history. His article, 'Scandal and Reform: The Nova Scotia Treasury, 1845-1860', appears in the December 1995 issue of The Nova Scotia Historical Review. No stranger to readers of this journal, JUDITH FINGARD is Professor of history at Dalhousie University and author of two books and numerous articles focussing on the history of the Atlantic region. Most recently, she contributed chapters to both The Atlantic Region to Confederation: A History and The Atlantic Provinces in Confederation. ELIZABETH BEATON, a PhD candidate in Interdisciplinary Studies at the University of Manitoba, is Assistant Professor and Senior Researcher at the Beaton Institute at the University College of Cape Breton. Her publications include articles in Canadian Ethnic Studies, Archivaria and Scientia Canadensis. PHILIPPE GARVIE is pursuing a PhD in geography at the University of Ottawa. His recent article in Les cahiers de la société acadienne, examines the influence of telecommunications networks on the development of Moncton and Saint John to 1931. A long time Professor of history at the University of New Brunswick, WALLACE BROWN has published extensively on the Loyalists. After he completes his current project — the story of the Loyalists in 'hot places' (the Bahamas, Belize, Sierra Leone) — he plans to pursue a post-retirement career as writer and film actor. DONALD WRIGHT is a doctoral candidate in Canadian history at the University of Ottawa. His dissertation focuses on the professionalization of history in English Canada, 1919-45. After graduating from Queen's University, PATRICIA WOOD completed a PhD at Duke University. She is currently teaching in the Department of History and Canadian Studies at Duke. SUZANNE MORTON teaches at McGill University. She is the author of Ideal Surroundings: Domestic Life in a Working-Class Suburb in the 1920s.
